In Search of the Fountain of Youth

By Lone Bedford, DDS, Paul Werdorn, DMD

If you are doing your best to keep your teeth looking like they should, then you are doing your part. But if you are not, you are not alone. Many people are looking for ways to improve their dental health and appearance. And because of the increasing emphasis on oral health, there are more opportunities than ever to practice your skills.

Like everything else in life, the more we do, the better we get. That's why we call it dental practice. We never stop learning and improving our skills. If you enjoy it, I would like to share some of the general principles of cosmetic dentistry and some of the techniques used to achieve a profession.

This is an example of an excellent cosmetic dental result. The patient, a 35-year-old female, had a history of extensive dental trauma. She had experienced several accidents that resulted in the loss of several teeth. She had also undergone several previous cosmetic dental procedures, but the results were not satisfactory.

Her super soft smile was in need of some improvement. She had a desire to have a complete examination, including radiographs, models, and photographs for the purpose of reconstruction (Fig. 2). We did a full examination, including a complete oral examination, and found that she was in need of several dental procedures.
